For the past decade Ipswich has embraced the Spill Festival, a community arts take-over of the town, which, through its international connections, has put Ipswich at the forefront of the nation's cultural agenda.

This year Spill is back with a new mission and a new look event more focused on its community roots and with plans to stage a run of fun, art-based activities that will bring people into the heart of the town.

New artistic director Robin Deacon says Spill is weaving itself into the fabric of Ipswich with more events than ever being staged on the Cornhill, with other activities and performances dotted around the town centre as a way of reintroducing people to the area after the alienating effects of Covid.
